

Which language levels can be attained in an integration course?

To determine your language level, you will have to take an assessment test before participating in an integration course. This may allow you to skip one or more course modules.

Following the successful completion of the integration course, a certificate is issued. The certificate confirms your German language skills at level B1 or A2, depending on the test results. If you fail to pass level B1, you may repeat 300 lesson units upon application.

Special courses

The literacy course is aimed at those who are unable to read and write or unfamiliar with Latin characters.

The course for students learning an additional alphabet is intended for foreigners who learned to read and write in their own language, but do not know the latin alphabet (the letters of the german language).

The course for young adults is designed for individuals up to the age of 27 and provides them with support as they enter the German education system or labor market. Among other things, the course features professional orientation and internships.

Both course types last about 10 months.

How to find an integration course near you?

You can find your nearest integration course online with the aid of the BAMF search engine:

Integration courses

If you have immigrated to Germany, an integration course is the best way to learn German quickly and find your way in German society.

In general an integration course lasts 7 months and takes place on a half-day basis from Monday to Friday. It consists of a German course amounting to 600 lesson units (900 units for literacy courses and courses for young adults), followed by an orientation course of 100 units. The orientation course provides additional information on German society, covering topics including culture, values, the legal system and history.

You can choose the language school where you would like to attend the integration course yourself. Approved language schools in the District of Hohenlohe are listed on the inside section.
